Example Answer 2

Life expectancy is increasing all around the world, and this has both positive and negative implications. One negative implication is the burden it has on the taxpayer. Since more and more people are living longer and having longer retirements, there is a shortage of funds available for essentials such as pensions and healthcare. On the other hand, there are social benefits of this phenomenon. For instance, grandparents have more time to spend with their grandchildren, which can help build a stronger sense of community and encourage family values. All things considered, there are a number of positive and negative implications of people living longer.
