There are many things that I have learned from watching Korean films. Firstly, the most interesting thing I have learned is about Korean eating customs. When dining in Korea, it's common place to share food. For example, at a restaurant Koreans usually order a large amount of food that is shared among all guests rather than each person ordering their own dish. Additionally, I have improved my skills in Korean. Even though I am studying Korean at a college, watching Korean movies has taught me a lot of spoken idioms and slang expressions that do not appear in textbooks.

Life expectancy is increasing all around the world, and this has both positive and negative implications. One negative implication is the burden it has on the taxpayer. Since more and more people are living longer and having longer retirements, there is a shortage of funds available for essentials such as pensions and healthcare. On the other hand, there are social benefits of this phenomenon. For instance, grandparents have more time to spend with their grandchildren, which can help build a stronger sense of community and encourage family values.
